South Florida is home to many ethnic minority and immigrant communities, and much of our clinical work will need to address their diverse and ever changing needs. Bronfenbrenner’s (1986) developmental-ecological model suggests that multiple, complex factors impact children and families and many of these go beyond the individual strengths and needs of children and their caregivers. Nonetheless, existing evidence-based practices are aimed primarily at remedying problematic parent and child behaviors without addressing the stressors that cause and exacerbate them. This presentation will focus on contextual issues to consider when working with low-income, ethnic minority youth and their families, including: the impact of multiple, chronic and uncontrollable stressors on family life (e.g., poverty, neighborhood disadvantage, acculturative stress); the importance of “fit” when choosing coping strategies, especially for uncontrollable stressors; the importance of helping families build, re-build, and seek social support during times of stress and transition; and the potential role of culturally-valued strategies, such as faith-based coping and faith-based social support.
ABOUT THE PRESENTERS

Diana Formoso, Ph.D. is an assistant professor at Nova Southeastern University’s Center for Psychological Studies. She received her doctorate in clinical psychology from Arizona State University and completed a post-doctoral fellowship in prevention science at the University of Illinois at Chicago. She uses community-based participatory research methods to better understand risk and protective factors that shape youth development across settings (e.g., families, schools, neighborhoods), and especially seeks to understand how poverty, acculturation, and cultural values shape child mental health. Ultimately, this work informs the development of culturally-competent and contextually-relevant mental health interventions for low-income, ethnic minority and immigrant families.

Josie A. Augustin, M.S. is a doctoral student at Nova Southeastern University’s Center for Psychological Studies. Her clinical and research interests include working with young adult populations and studying ethnic minority issues, particularly among Haitians. She is interested in the relations between social support and mental health among Haitians and in barriers to help-seeking from professionals when existing sources of support fall short. She is currently a practicum student at Henderson Student Counseling Services.

Sohani Barrientos, M.S. is a doctoral student at Nova Southeastern University’s Center for Psychological Studies. A graduate of Florida International University, her clinical interests include children with developmental disabilities, anxiety disorders, and the potential role of spirituality in mental health among Latinos. She is currently a practicum student at the University of Miami’s Autism Spectrum Assessment Clinic.
